Making Baptist Connections: American Indian Women at the University of Redlands in the 1930s.

In the 1930s, there was a small population of female American Indian students attending the University of Redlands (UR). Who were they and how did they get there? Talerico-Brown's work seeks to examine American Indian women students at the University of Redlands (UR) in Redlands, California, during the 1930s and how their education at Indian schools prior to their acceptance into the UR shaped their identities as university students. An analysis of archival evidence at the American Baptist Historical Society in Atlanta, Georgia, details the establishment and development of the University of Redlands and provides context for an ongoing inquiry into the American Indian students' experiences there.
